Mixing It up

Managers at General Mills faced some challenges when it acquired Pillsbury. The company's chief learning officer Kevin Wilde wants the best marketing approach for both organisations. So, they decided to identify, share, and integrate the best practices from both companies. And, employee teamwork played a major role in how the company proceeded.

An intensive training program called Brand Champions was created and launched. The program was designed not just for marketing specialist but for all employees from different functional areas who worked on particular brands. These cross-functional teams attended the in-house training together as unified group. It helped employees understand and appreciate different perspectives. Another benefit of including people from different functions was improved communication throughout the company. People were no longer griping about what other functional areas were doing. Employees began to understand how the other functional areas worked and mini-version of the course. All employees were able to understand the language marketers speak and why things are done as they are.

And there's another example of how successful the program has been. Betty Croker is well known for packaged cake mixes and loss so for cookies mixes. Inspired by input from the group, the cookies-mix team decided to go after scratch bakers (people who bake from scratch rather than from a boxed mix). As one person said, they were "taking on grandma." The cookie mixes were formulated, and now the brand owns 90 percent of the dry cookies mix category.
